Nuclear weapons and the illusion of missile defense. by Richard Butler § RELEASE DATE: Jan. 1, 2001. The literal, political, and moral abomination of nuclear weapons are made abundantly clear by a former UN weapons inspector in Iraq and a longtime fixture on the nuclear-disarmament scene, who suggests actions that would move us toward their eradication. In the first chapter, the author traces her awakening to the reality of a brutal British colonial history and the ways that history continues to impact race relations in the present, especially between blacks and the police. Eddo-Lodge analyzes the system that has worked against blacks and kept them subjugated to laws that work against rather than for them. Although missile defense is featured in the book's title, the NPT is at the heart of Butler's argument. The NPT is based on a simple bargain: countries that did not possess nuclear weapons at the time of the treaty's signing pledged not to seek them, while the five countries that already had such weapons committed themselves to work toward nuclear disarmament. This bargain, according to Butler, created a norm that no state or person should possess nuclear weapons. Butler rejects the United States' assertions that it has to build missile defenses because arms control has failed and that nuclear proliferation is too far advanced to reverse. Written prior to the events of September 11th in New York, and now fully updated to examine the implications of these attacks, this is a timely examination of the status of the world's nuclear weapon policies.
