The chapter focuses on reformers who argued for reform on the grounds of macro-economic concerns and concerns for social stability, such as the claim that employee injury would reduce the profitability or efficiency of the US economy as a whole. Those arguments existed alongside claims that compensation laws would benefit employers because the court-based system of employee injury law was unnecessarily expensive. The chapter explains the political economy of the large corporation that made compensation laws app The labor movement in the United States grew out of the need to protect the common interest of workers. For those in the industrial sector, organized labor. From that time on, local craft unions proliferated in the cities, publishing lists of "prices" for their work, defending their trades against diluted and cheap labor and, increasingly, demanding a shorter workday in the face of the Industrial Revolution. Thus a job-conscious orientation was quick to emerge, and in its wake there followed the key structural elements characterizing American trade unionism.
