Good arguments are either cogent or sound, otherwise they are bad. We now have all the ingredients to be able to tell when arguments are good or bad. And it's now quite simple: good arguments are either cogent or sound, otherwise, they are bad. Easy. Here's the diagram we introduced in the previous video to help you while judging arguments: Let's see how we can use the diagram with some concrete examples. There are two kinds of arguments: deductive and non-deductive. Now, suppose you're facing a deductive argument. But also, it doesn't seem like the argument is giving reasons that would guarantee that the conclusion is true. Is the argument strong? Not really.
